

Maureen Alsop

Maureen

Looking through the window of the false cupboard. She pointed you into the mouth's downy nests. Birth tiny birth. Weak streams of breath gather across the field. Outside, under diminutive cedars, a valley of asters, an early snow.

The watched birch are seen wakened, and at the fire pit your dead parents. Sawdust filmed the darkening valley. You were three years old when you first heard sunlight rip through trees, narrow shoots branched upward to the sound of its diminish. Around you now this October farmhouse yellows.

Sapling words influence the barriers of a middle distance. Bees thrum the trough's surface as the edges of your mother's spirit give way. She is relegated again into the physical. She wraps three amber plums in sackcloth.

